Preferably, the partial specification also includes a standard deviation. In this case, the standard deviation of the correction factor is preferably determined in a test process and used as the standard deviation of the average value of the correction factor. In a preferred embodiment, the correction factor is determined over a period of at least one-hour, the average value of the correction factor is determined, and the standard deviation of the average value is determined. Preferably, the correction factor for the partial specification is determined by a numerical model. It is also possible to use time-dependent correction factors, i.e., correction factors which are different for different times of the day. The time-dependent correction factor is preferably determined as a function of the partial specification of the specification operator. The time-dependent correction factors are preferably determined as a function of a characteristic curve of a time profile for the partial specification of the specification operator. The characteristic curve of the time profile for the partial specification of the specification operator may, for example, be an indicator curve. Preferably, the correction factor for the partial specification of the specification operator is determined as a function of the time-dependent correction factor for the corresponding partial specification of the preceding specification operator, respectively. The time-dependent correction factor is preferably determined as a function of the time-dependent correction factor for the partial specification of the specification operator.
