Change website size. System requirements for running KAMPUS WebBrowser: Windows XP or higher .NET Framework 2.0 or higher Any browser This means that the owner of a website can view the sales of the web page by the addition of a mouse click to view the source code of the page. Source code is the actual HTML code of the page. The source code of a web page is the rendered HTML, CSS, JavaScript, and images of the page. When all three are combined, this results in the web page you see on your browser. We all know that JavaScript is used to give interactive elements to web pages. Without it, web pages would be static and boring. Thanks to JavaScript, web sites can change and display certain types of information dynamically to make websites more interesting. However, JavaScript also provides a way for webmasters and website owners to view the source code of a website, view all of the HTML code and see what was added to the website through JavaScript. This is done by adding the necessary code in the page of the website. There are some scripts that are already loaded. For example, this is the case with Google Analytics. The source code of the page will contain these codes and it will be displayed in a new tab. When the website owner clicks on the tab, they will see the source code for their website page. However, depending on the website and its features, this could be illegal and should be avoided. Besides, any code added to a website page can reduce its loading speed and degrade the performance of the website. If the source code is viewed on a small or slow computer, it may cause the page to stop loading. In order to view the source code of a website, it can be downloaded on a separate computer. Although downloading the source code does not hurt the website, it can slow the loading speed of the website. For this reason, it is very important to make sure that the source
