Published by American Chemical Society. V. COMMERCIAL POTENTIAL. MOST IMPORTANT to determine the correct treatmentIn an effort to ease the growing number of unfilled physician jobs in emergency medicine, the American College of Emergency Physicians on Friday proposed a 3-year pilot program for which emergency medicine residency programs would be required to pay tuition for those students who are already in the programs. The program would be similar to the one in place in the primary care residency, ACP argued. "If we pay now to have a fully trained resident, we'll have a fully trained resident" "The medical training system is broken," said Dr. Loretta Krause, ACP senior vice president of professional and medical affairs, who described the pilot as a way to fix it. "It is not sustainable that you have job openings for only 25 percent of people who have spent years studying to be physicians and we cannot pay to train them, we cannot train them at all." The pilot program would allow current emergency medicine residents to pay tuition for 0cc13bf012
